A: A sugar daddy is a person who provides financial support for someone else who is in a non-marital relationship. In this context, a person who is in a non-marital relationship with a younger woman is being called a sugar daddy. The phrase sugar daddy is usually used when the older man (also known as a sugar daddy) is married and the younger woman is not. The meaning is the same, though. In your particular example, the context is clear from the conversation the characters are having. The first speaker, Mr. Dan (the person the young woman is talking about) is married, and the second, the friend who invited her to the party (the person who isn't married), is not. A: It means a guy who is older (usually at least 35 and preferably older) and also wealthy and providing the young women with money and gifts. The young woman has likely heard it before because it's a fairly common nickname for people in this situation. There are many variations on the story and these include: The man is a millionaire, who the girl considers her'sugar daddy' for the free ride that he will be giving her The man is a wealthy and older man who is helping the girl with loans The man is a younger attractive wealthy man who is helping the girl with loans The man is a 20-something millionaire who is helping the girl with loans If you want to know about the actual story then you will have to look for it somewhere, but the above will be an introduction to the various variations.
