Staphylococcus aureus is found in skin, noses, tonsils, throat, and even food such as raw meats and cheeses. It is also responsible for several illnesses including blood poisoning, pneumonia, skin infections, and abscesses. One of the most common and deadly illnesses spread through staphylococcus aureus is methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus (MRSA). This microbe was first discovered in hospitals in the 1950s. Since then, it has become increasingly common in hospitals and in the community. Most methicillin-resistant Staphylococcus aureus (MRSA) strains are acquired through contact with other people or animals, but the strains that spread between people can be spread from places such as hospitals, homes, childcare centers, and nursing homes. Common
