In this documentation page, they state that the constant pool in a Java class "reserves bytecodes to represent constants, field references, and method calls that appear in the bytecode of a class or interface". Why is this? A: To save memory, a Java class is an array of objects, each of which is a JVM instruction that computes a value. Each of those instructions is an opcode followed by arguments. The constant pool is a collection of already computed instruction opcodes and the types of the objects they compute. When the JVM creates a class, it first starts by saving all of its constant values in the constant pool. Then when it creates the class, it only needs to compute the value of these constants again, instead of recomputing them every time. The Brooklyn Nets had their first practice since the Atlanta Hawks beat them in Game 6 of the opening round of the playoffs on Sunday, and their third-best player had a good reason for his appearance. He was named the starting power forward. Brook Lopez started at the 4, and was joined by Brook at the 5. It appears as if the Nets have decided to take a step away from the Thad Young experiment. Young was an All-Star in his rookie season with the Nets, and was named to the Eastern Conference All-Star team, but never developed into the player the team hoped he would be when they drafted him in 2009. Brook, meanwhile, is much more of a real NBA center. In only his fourth season, the 6'11", 260-pound Lopez already holds the record for most blocks by a power forward in NBA history (295).
