A scanning electron microscopy (SEM) of aldehyde fixed frozen-hydrated cells revealed the presence of a curved central cell wall layer with internal spicules on the spheroidal cell surface. In contrast, in situ freeze-dried cells did not contain the central wall layer, and exhibited a spherical surface. In situ freeze-drying of whole cells resulted in cell dehydration, with the preservation of cell structure. The effects of dehydration on P. pastoris cell wall morphology were studied and compared with SEM and X-ray micro-diffraction (XRD) of in situ freeze-dried cells. Atomic force microscopy (AFM) and SEM imaging of in situ freeze-dried cells was used to determine cell surface topography. AFM imaging demonstrated increased cell size after freeze-drying.
